On January 27, 1997, the FBI received a letter from the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) regarding the FBI's use of the National Security Agency's (NSA) bulk collection of telephone records. The ACLU requested that the FBI provide a copy of the records to the ACLU. The FBI responded that the records were not available for release to the ACLU. The ACLU then filed a lawsuit in federal court to compel the FBI to release the records. The court granted the ACLU's request for a writ of habeas corpus, ordering the FBI to release the records. The FBI then appealed the court's decision to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. The Ninth Circuit affirmed the court's decision, ordering the FBI to release the records. The FBI then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari. The Supreme Court granted the FBI's petition, and the case was heard on October 1, 1997. The Supreme Court ruled in favor of the FBI, holding that the FBI's use of the NSA's bulk collection of telephone records was lawful. The Court held that the FBI's use of the records was a reasonable search for evidence of terrorism, and that the FBI's use of the records did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The Court also held that the FBI's use of the records was not a search for evidence of crime, and therefore did not require a warrant. The Court's decision was a significant victory for the FBI, and it allowed the FBI to continue its use of the NSA's bulk collection of telephone records.

may significantly affect the results of any analysis of housing patterns. In this study, however, the effect of mobility on the results was limited because the study was restricted to households that had remained in the same place for at least 12 months.
The study was also limited by the
